Q: ruby read text file I have a text file test.txt contains 10011 0321 I want to read it and 1. get three columns which are first,second and third and create three hash for first, second and third. 2.print "first key is"> so far I got. f = File.open("./test.txt","r") a=1 File.open("./test.txt","r") do |source| source.each_line do |line| puts f["a"].to_i+", "+f["b"].to_i+", "+f["c"].to_i end end but I do not know how to implement it into the script. Any help? A: You're not actually using any of the variables. The way you have it is also very confusing. Here's a script that does what you want: f = File.open('test.txt') first_hash = Hash.new second_hash = Hash.new third_hash = Hash.new while(line = f.gets) do first,

second, third = line.split(/\s+/) first_hash[first.to_i] = second.to_i second_hash[second.to_i] = third.to_i end p first_hash # => { 10011=>0321 } p second_hash # => { 0321=>10011 } p third_hash # => { }

If you want to read the file line-by-line, there's a way to do this. First, let's make an IO object to read the file: `File.open('test.txt', 'r')` do `|f| #...` end Next, create a loop which reads a line, splits it, uses the split method to get the three values, and checks to see if they're empty. If they are, then we have to create a new hash to put them in. `lines = [] while line = f.gets #...` lines with matched nonalcoholic patients with other diagnoses. Their main characteristics included: a high incidence of antisocial behavior (87.2%), a greater proportion of women (66.7% compared to 43%), and more frequent delirium and dementia (35.4% versus 22.4%). Secondary diagnoses for the alcoholic patients were depression (41.7%) and alcoholism (24.2%). These patients were characterized by a higher incidence of psychotic symptoms, including hallucinations (48.3% compared to 20%), depression (66.7% compared to 18.2%), and suicide attempts (16.7% compared to 6.9%), and they had a longer hospital stay (37.2 days compared to 14.5 days). Diagnostic failure was common, with only 50% of the alcoholic patients receiving a diagnosis of alcohol abuse or alcohol dependence compared with 78% of the nonalcoholic patients. Island Sun "Island Sun" is a song by Jim Morrison from the Doors compilation album End of the Night. It was included on their 1965 debut album The Doors, which was released independently in April 1967. The song has become an influential rock and roll standard; it is frequently covered and is often included on live compilations of songs by the Doors. It is also part of the music used in the opening credits to House of Cards and House of Cards: Endgame. Background After the recording of Sunshine on My Shoulders as a single in the summer of 1964, The Doors released a self-titled album in late 1964. After the initial success, the group suffered a series of personnel changes and financial setbacks, as well as an infamous fire at their Los Angeles practice space. During this difficult time, they rented a beach house in Venice on the island of Santa Monica near LA, California. In August 1965, the band booked several rooms in the house for the summer, with a plan to record new material there. During their six-week stay, Morrison and the bandmates spent most of their time partying and hanging out. Some of the band members decided to leave and moved to San Francisco, but the group soon returned to LA. Morrison wrote the song in the Venice home during the Summer of 1965, and the band debuted it live at The Whisky a Go Go in Los Angeles on April 20
